Automated Proofreader Provides Real-Time Feedback to Writers

Grammarly's New Editor Instantaneously Shows Writers Spelling and Grammar-Checking Explanations to Improve the Writing Process

San Francisco, Calif. – April 22, 2014 – Grammarly, the world's leading automated proofreader, today launched a new and improved version of its flagship product, the Grammarly Editor. The newest version of the Editor offers spelling and grammar checking explanations in real-time to help writers see--and learn from--their mistakes while they write.

Most spelling and grammar-checking tools provide detailed suggestions for improving writing only after a document has been written. This means that writers are not able to incorporate the feedback into the writing process or easily learn from their mistakes. The launch of the new Grammarly Editor means that proofreading is no longer an afterthought. Writers can now shift their focus to producing quality content throughout the writing process while also improving their writing skills.

"Grammarly's new Editor provides automated proofreading feedback as documents are written," said Ayan Mandal, vice president of products at Grammarly. He continued, "Writers no longer have to wade through word processing toolbars to ensure that their document is correct because Grammarly now provides suggestions in real time."

In addition to providing a redesigned interface, the new Editor operates on an updated version of Grammarly's automated proofreading software, which will result in the improved accuracy of spelling and grammar checks.

The Grammarly Editor is available now. To sign up for a Grammarly account, visit www.grammarly.com. Existing customers may access Grammarly's new Editor by logging into their Grammarly account.
